TechnologiesQ: connecting 3 C# programs in visual studio I have 3 c# programs that need to work together. In each program there is a form for the user to input a number, after which it will send that number to a database. The number is then read from the database and displayed to the user. I need each program to have access to the database so that the user input can be applied to the database rather than each program needing to make a call to the database. Is it possible to connect each program to the database? If not, is there a way to make a database class that can be called by all 3 programs? Thanks. A: You may consider to write a web application that would receive the data from your other 3 programs and store it in a database. You could put the web application in your own domain and give it a domain-level username and password (it would be pretty easy to implement) or use an external web service that would be accessible from the internet. For example, the PHP SOAP web service will allow you to call it with a normal browser. I would imagine you can do the same with .NET web services. I suggest you read the Visual Studio help to get an idea about the capabilities of Visual Studio (or ASP.NET at least) : Research Search Driving trucks in the retail and service industries can be an occupation that takes many years to master. One very important aspect of truck driving is safe driving, and one of the biggest dangers drivers can face is the numerous objects and people they pass each day. Unfortunately, not everyone is aware of dangers associated with being a truck driver. Many truck drivers go
